One of the main phenomena that globalized societies face nowadays is mobility. Understanding the debate on current migration flows should not continue to be explored only through the prism of international migration. In recent years, a new academic debate has been opened regarding the mobility caused by the internal and external movement of researchers, workers, tourists, businessmen, students, volunteers and people in general. This new framework is based on economic, political and cultural openness, where mobility is natural rather than static, which is neither normal nor desirable.

This seminar aims to contribute to new debates on this phenomenon by taking into consideration issues such as new migration flows, new versions of movement, the interconnections created in this new transnational sphere and economic, social and political consequences. Ultimately, it seeks to create a scientific, political and social debate on new versions of mobility and its relations with transnational studies, globalism and cosmopolitanism.
